Tunefish is an app that empowers you to play a chord as you read it. Each chord that you play is mapped to a specific voice, with the names given by the app. This is a sight-reading tool of course, and the more you practice the more you will get. This is a completely new app, and a progressive one at that. What is revolutionary here is that you can choose between a traditional notation and an alternative style, where a player line goes above the staff and a note box in the staff itself. When you play a chord, the app will tell you which voice is used, and where in that voice it is played. This is a tremendously valuable tool as you can instantly recognize how any phrase should be played. The voices are very flexible. You can select from solo, duo, quartet, quintet, as well as even trio arrangements. You may also choose which finger to use on each voice. You can choose to change the color of a voice in a similar way you can change its note color. You can also choose a voice from the scratch to get started with, and make any changes from there. Another highlight of this app is the chord library. It features over 400 chords that are well organized into main categories. Each entry has a multi-tab (on multi keyboards for example) allowing you to play every possible combination. A special feature includes a chord diagram which illustrates which key you will play with which voice. A quick guitar chord for free! Save time by quickly transcribing guitar riffs, and even play them back. Up to three chords are supported by this app, and they are brilliantly mapped to voice names which are visually indicated. The buttons are placed conveniently on the top bar, and even the tab layout is selected and saved automatically. Typing the names manually for every voice is tedious and not very effective, so a feature is included that will learn your voice names, and just use them to guess the names of the voices automatically.
